

We contacted your sales department nearly a week ago, clearly outlining our requirements for a quotation involving the supply of enterprise-grade networking hardware. Despite multiple follow-ups and even a direct call to your office, we've received nothing but vague responses and empty assurances. If your company lacks the basic decency to acknowledge a serious business request, then you're clearly not ready to engage with clients operating on strict timelines. We don't have the bandwidth to chase unresponsive vendors. Either act like a professional or don't pretend to be in the market at all.

Let this message serve as your final notice. If we do not receive a complete, itemized quotation with price breakdown, delivery timelines, and warranty information by close of business tomorrow, we will strike your firm off our procurement list. Furthermore, we'll make it known to our industry contacts that your response standards are unreliable. Don't mistake silence for patience—we expect action, not excuses.
